Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: .Restaurant The purchasing department is directly under the supervision of the business manager and is responsible to him for all expenditures. This department honors all requisitions from the sales department and requires a statement of all supplies on hand from the kitchen, which term includes the pantry, shell counter, baker, butcher, etc. The main duties of the buyer comprehend the purchase of all supplies necessary for consumption from day to day, the purchase of supplies for storage, the sale of all excess supplies either in the house store room, or in outside storage, and in general such duties as are in keeping with the advantageous purchase, storage, and issuance of all stores necessary to the proper maintenance of the restaurant trade. The bill-of-fare for the coming day is the point from which the buyer works in planning a day s campaign. This bill calls for an estimated amount of supplies for each item. These supplies must come from three places, as follows: (1) Market. (2) The house store room. (3) Storage. When the bill-of-fare for the coming day is laid down before the buyer he first checks off the items that the store room will provide for. These need no further attention as the store room is kept so well stocked that it will take care of the bill, unless the conditions are out of the ordinary. Figure I; daily supply report of the fish and poultry department The buyer knows the condition of the store...
