Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: . be deemed qualified for admission to any Government appointment under Es. 15, that is, not of a menial character, who has not passed the primary school or some equivalent or higher examination recognized by the Government as a service test. It may confidently be expected that the working of these two examinations and of the rules they have given rise to will result in immense benefit to the public service, first by guarding against admission into its lower grades of persons of very inferior or of no qualifications whatever, and, secondly, by ensuring for the higher grades a class of men possessing superior attainments and a greater breadth and depth of knowledge than the Government had been previously content to require from its servants. Among other changes that may be noted in the history of the commission during the last four years is the abolition of the Middle School examination, which, instituted in 1879, was held for the last time in December 1890. Both as a service and as a promotion test, this examination had proved very useful; but, when the Upper Secondary examination was instituted the objections to its continuance were considered to outweigh any considerations that might be urged for its retention. Its place will be taken by the new Lower Secondary examination, the scheme for which is now before Government awaiting sanction. The number of public examinations has still further been diminished by the abolition of the Special Primary and Upper Primary...
