Not illustrated. 1878 Excerpt: .happen the band, and everything was prepared for the event, which poor Winona regarded as a sacrifice worse than death. At this time her tribe and family departed from their habitation on the St Peters river, to visit the locality where Prairie du Chien now stands. Before crossing the Mississippi they halted at the bluff celebrated in these days as the Maiden s Leap. At the foot of this the Indians were wont to gather blue clay with which to paint themselves. Here, surrounded by all the natural beauties that the savage mind could appreciate, it was determined to hold Winona s wedding. Day after day the company halted, and the dusky wooer pleaded. Gentle means failing, severity and threatened torture was tried. At last poor Winona, deprived of her lover and sentenced to live with a man she loathed, on the day appointed for her marriage, climbed to the top of the cliff, and in full sight of her companions and relatives, upbraided them with their cruelty, and began her death song. The desperate resolve of the princess was evident, and while the old chief stood below and begged her by all the filial obligations her faith demands to desist, her brothers ran with lightning swiftness to reach her ere yet it was too late. But with the determination unchanged by pleading or threat, she denounced the father and family who had broken her heart, and precipitated herself from the brow of the cliff...
