Not illustrated. 1832 Excerpt: .opposite side of a river, is observed throwing a rose fastened to an arrow to his mistress. The missile falls at Zelmira's feet. Zelhirah. Picking up the rose and arrow. By the sharp sting of Cupid's potent darts, A rose on wings! Thou dearest little dear; But what a thorn! My lady, see this herald--It flew just now from yonder ground. Full sure, Some god, enraptured, sends this pretty page To tell thee the tale of his love. Beware Of arrows thus adorned. The monster burns; For look, this shaft he heaves with swiftest speed, To pierce my lady's heart. Amadorah. Smiling and receiving the rote Zelmira, say; Dost thou know what is love? Zelmira. Know--what--is love? Forsooth I do, my lady, know it; full well too. A Flame is Love, that breaks at times unknown In th inward heart! It rages most, when pure, And burning on the shrine of Constancy. Love is a cloak that wraps a maiden's heart; Bespangled o'er with glittering things; tis warm, As cloak of double fur; and two can wear it. Though tight's the fit, some few will have it loose; But soon from those a transient blast will tear it, Dull, apathetic set, that love to be cold.--Nought on of garment else, if gathered close, Like furnace fierce, it scorches to the quick; And, were it not for holes that kindly let in The fresh ning breeze of contrariety, Twould,...
